Morality and "Biological Worth"

WELCOME/OPENING PRAYER: Josh Morford

How should we live? A Barna Group survey revealed that 86% of American adults believe that "To be fulfilled in life, you should pursue the things you desire most" (Barna OmniPoll, 2015). Surprisingly, 76% of practicing Christians agreed. A different question on a different poll showed that when it comes to moral truth, that is, those truths that tell us what is right or wrong, two-thirds of Americans either believe that moral truth is relative to circumstances (44%) or haven't given it much thought (21%) [<https://www.barna.com/research/the-end-of-absolutes-americas-new-moral-code/>]. In other words, either the values by which one lives change by the situation or you don't really know what you value or why.

There is an attended nursery for ages 6 months to 36 months during worship.

As Christians, we take our cues from Jesus the Christ. This seems an obvious fact, but clearly the statistics show that this isn't nearly as obvious to many Christians! What, then, governs how we should live? Is there a reliable, unchanging set of truths that gives direction to our lives? Philosopher of science and atheist Michael Ruse once wrote that our morality, our values and ethics, have "biological worth" and that's all. They're nothing more than survival aids that keep us from tearing each other apart. But what does Jesus say? He says that we live the way we do because we love God with all our being, which then compels us to love what God loves, namely, other people. So, what do you think, Christian? Live the way we do out of self-interest and to preserve our society? Or, live from a posture of love that stretches from the God of love Himself to the neighbors outside our doors, known and unknown? This is what we're talking about today.
