 Eastside, Easter is coming quickly! As you know, we always host an egg hunt for our kids, and we need donated Easter eggs! Preferably, we'd like them to be pre-filled. If not, that's OK. We can stuff them later. So, whether you can bring pre-filled eggs, only plastic eggs, or only candy, we'll take whatever you can donate to make sure that our kids have a fun and memorable day.

Welcome to Worship
We're so glad you're here!

Hunger Games. Divergent. The Matrix. The Road. 28 Days Later. The Book of Eli. The Walking Dead. These blockbuster films and television shows have dominated our entertainment world for over a decade now. In these and more, we are introduced to a future in which “the end” has already happened, in which nuclear and environmental disasters have already removed any semblance of the world we know, and in which humanity has either been decimated or consumed with zombie-viruses that turn us all into walking corpses. Other shows, on the other hand, keep us firmly rooted in our own world but partner us with a diverse cast of antiheroes like Tony Soprano, Walter White, Frank Underwood, and Vic Mackey (you can figure out the shows yourself!).

What do the successes of films, shows, and characters like these say about the spirit of modern culture? First, it shows a declining confidence about what the future might hold. Second, it shows a certain resignation to the complexities of life and the ability of the human spirit to withstand all its pressures without some degree of moral compromise. In other words, the future is bleak and no one makes it through life squeaky clean (so don't even try). Regardless of how you analyze it, this points to a general loss of hope for the world and ourselves. More seriously, this is confirmed by the rising rates of depression and suicide, especially among the young. What, then, should we be hoping for? Where are we going? What are our lives building towards? This is our topic today. Listen up! By Matt Carver
